Natural rubber is the most widely used of the known vulcanizable elastomers. It is made by polymerizing natural rubber latex, a water based solution of natural rubber. Natural rubber latex is available in two basic types. One contains sulfur in the form of natural and synthetic thiurams and other compounds, and the other is sulfur-free, and contains allantoin, resorcinol and other compounds. Strictly speaking, natural rubber (NR) is a rubber obtained from rubber trees, such as guayule or may (Parthenium argentatum), particularly when they are cured in the presence of sulfur (known as "vulcanized natural rubber" or "vulcanized NR"). Natural rubber is composed of long chains of repetitive units—resin, short-chain hydrocarbons (i.e., hydrocarbon chains of less than four carbon atoms), and protein. Up to about 85 percent of the polymer is hydrocarbon. The others are protein and small amounts of water, alcohols, and other polar compounds. A natural rubber tree in the undergrowth of the rain forest of Ecuador, the Amazon basin or Southeast Asia, will have about ten to thirty eyes. The latex collected from each eye is piped into large tanks and diluted. After concentrating, the solution is made into threads, which are wound into a rope. 09e8f5149f
