“HyperMotion Technology” is in FIFA 20. “We’ve been using this technology in FIFA 20 and even beyond,” said Lee Cheuk Kuan, CEO of PES. “At EA SPORTS, we’re always striving to bring the real world of football to life in FIFA. Our goal is to take what we have developed for a number of years in the real-world football space and ensure that it flows into our game” said Sid Sijbrandij, VP, Electronic Arts Sports. “This is the first time we have shipped the technology to our customers and we’re pleased with the results so far.” EA’s soccer simulation titles has seen significant leaps in motion capture technology for the last decade, due to the massive influx of data from players in motion on the pitch. If you were to watch a real-world match today it would be fairly evident that the soccer player's playing style is predominantly what has been captured in motion capture. To share this vast amount of information that we have captured about the players with our users, was what we had to do. It's only through the combination of real data and real animations that we have our players move and behave with the same life that they do in the world of the game," said Sid Sijbrandij, VP, Electronic Arts Sports. Motion capture provides the authentic contact that results from a player fighting for the ball and defeating the opposition. Add to that, the individual playing style of a player. The more individual style that players display, which is evident in data, the better the game. The technology is especially appealing to those who are games designers and to those who create the game of football. "We want to make sure that we are living and breathing football from the beginning, the training process, the match play, every step,” said Sid Sijbrandij, VP, Electronic Arts Sports. “It is too much of a cost to do the full-body capture at this stage in the game. The aim is to work on certain key areas such as the arms and legs and we will do a full body scan when we are ready.” A complete capture of the real-world player and the data that it creates is a significant endeavor. In order to capture the players, a shooting rig that holds up to 20 cameras
