Twitter.com/LucyLinderman Typhoid fever in the preschool child: delayed recovery of antibody levels by immunologic testing. Twenty-nine children with typhoid fever were studied prospectively in order to investigate the possibility that secondary immunity may delay recovery of antibody levels and thereby affect susceptibility to disease. The average duration of the febrile illness prior to detection of antibody was 1.2 days. Only 8 (28%) of the children with fever alone recovered fully. Thirteen (54%) of 24 children with a febrile illness 1 to 5 days prior to the detection of antibody had evidence of secondary immunity. Of those children, 11 (85%) who were followed serologically were treated for recurrent infection and recovered. The mean interval before the appearance of measurable antibody was 0.9 months. Compared to the previously described group of children with secondary immunity, the children with primary and persistent immunity had a shorter mean duration of immunity (0.6 months vs. 1.7 months). The presence of secondary antibodies in four children who had been ill less than 5 days prior to detection of primary anti-typhoid antibody was remarkable. This may explain the appearance of these children with high antibody titers after exposure to typhoid vaccine. How to clone a bitcoin wallet
